Specializing in the history and preservation, Dorson is the author of two books on the Indianapolis 500, his mission is to capture the romance and spirit of the American road, documenting the evolution of the highway system after World War II.

Beginning with an interest in the backroads of San Luis Obispo, California in 1982, Dorson's adventure was inspired by driving through blinding rain storms and blizzards, majestic mountains of over 8,000 feet and endless miles, of bucolic American countryside. The result of his travels and more than 20 years of field work is a body of photographs that capture the spirit and romance of the evolving highway system. His bold, bright, photos are in numerous private and corporate collections nationwide.

The Galveston Railroad Museum, 2602 Santa Fe Place, is a living history museum offering educational and fun interactive experiences highlighting railroad travel and technology.
